Pursuant to a congressional request, GAO reviewed the: (1) roles and missions of the Army National Guards combat units; and (2) efforts by the Department of Defense (DOD) and the Army to redesign the Guards combat divisions. GAO found that: (1) despite reductions, the Army National Guards combat units may still be too large for projected war requirements; (2) the Guards eight remaining combat divisions and three separate combat units are not needed to meet the two-conflict strategy or any probable conflict scenarios; (3) DOD considers the excess Guard forces to be a strategic reserve that could be used as occupational and rotational forces, a deterrent against aggressive regimes, and support for civilian authorities, but it did not present any analytical support for the continued force levels; (4) DOD has not finalized plans for 15 enhanced Guard combat brigades, and fewer than 15 may be needed; (5) state missions often require more support skills and equipment than Guard combat forces, which usually supplement other state resources in emergencies; (6) over the last decade, states have needed only a fraction of the Guards personnel to meet their emergency requirements; (7) the Army is studying ways that the Guard could meet critical shortages in its support capabilities; and (8) DOD believes that since Guard forces exceed combat needs, reserve components with lower priority tasks should be eliminated or reorganized to meet higher priorities. This item ships from La Vergne, TN. Paperback.
